The deeply-felt recognition that the Absolute is all that is, and consequently that must include you, is the life-changing substance of enlightenment. All things are That, you as well as all other human beings: there is only That, in the sense of ultimate, permanent reality. How, then, does one live one's life when the present awareness is "I am That, and all else is That"; when the perception of being a "separate individual" has dissolved, and the ego (Latin for "I") is no longer at the center of one's perspective? "Real-i-zation" (the "enlightenment" the aspirant has sought) means "to make real". How do we make the real—the essence of timeless reality—the central expression of the Absolute perspective we have now discovered to be inevitably our own? To "make real" in one's life and activities the awareness that "all that is, is That" is unavoidably a life-altering engagement. Are you prepared to "live" with this discovery today?

Read Wolfe's Book. And Toss the Rest.

By Earthling

The shelves at the bookstore bend beneath the weight of row after row of self-help books.

Advaita's (nonduality's) core argument is that the self doesn't need help because it doesn't exist as anything more than a projection of our thinking process. In other words, it's an image (thought) arising and passing away, arising and passing away, in an unchanging mirror (simple awareness).

We have about 70,000 thoughts per day. And the vast majority are about our illusory selves. We are obsessed with a fiction.

This is where Robert Wolfe comes in. He's keen to have you realize that you're not what you think you are.

If we're not what we think we are, then what are we? And why does it matter?

Wolfe at 46: 'All that you know your self to be is nothing but a form—finite, impermanent. The source from which it "comes" and to which it "returns" is formless, without beginning or end in time or space. That, the teachings say, is your true nature.'

Wolfe at 178: 'The fundament of this teaching is that what you are seeking is actually inescapable, and you need merely recognize that fact. Your “essential nature” must be here, now. Any, and every, practice can only focus your attention on a desired future event, piping your awareness away from the Presence that is always everywhere—whether you are sitting thoughtless on a cushion, or not.'

Wolfe at 181: 'There is nowhere you need to go, and nothing you need to do in order to be connected to that which is the source of all that is. This omnipresent actuality, this unbroken Presence, is so thoroughly immersed in everything that it is everything. Therefore you—despite who you purport to be—are That. Being That, you will not, at any other time, be nearer to That. Whether or not you acknowledge your “true nature,” you are That. So, being That this very moment, time is irrelevant. You need not, if you awaken to the fact, occupy yourself with a pursuit for the presence of the limitless actuality any longer: you cannot even escape That!'

Bottom line: no need for another armload of self-help books. Psychological suffering is attached to a self. And the whole kit and caboodle are arising and passing away in your luminous, crystal clear, imperturbable awareness.

The peace you're looking for is right here. And always has been.

Doubt it? Read Wolfe's book. And toss the rest.

An Enlightened Work by an Enlightened Individual

By Henry

I am one of the many that Robert refers to as "having once caught a glimpse of the ultimate truth" only to have it slip away and return to dualistic thinking--you, me, others. That being said, Robert may be the most "awake" person on this planet. Robert also goes far deeper than another truly awake being, Adyashanti, into the science of enlightenment and how modern physics tends to prove that there is really just one absolute thing going on. In short, you are what you are looking for and this pertains to all enlightenment seekers. Anyway, my words don't do Robert or his great work justice. By all means, if you are a serious student of advaita teachings, enlightenment, awakening, etc. read this book. It will blow your mind in its simplicity on one hand and complexity on another. The only thing that I find disconcerting is that awakening is in a sense a death to the individual self that you believe you are. A true abiding awakening will create a huge shift in your life as you know it. As a business person with three great kids, I can't imagine awakening and then bailing on my financial obligations to my kids. That in itself will likely preclude me seeing my true self. If awakening is the only thing that truly matters to you, you have to be willing to lose it all. All being the worldly things, people, thoughts, etc. that make up your so called "life" today. There is no bargaining with TRUTH. Me saying, I want to be truly awake AND I want to be a good parent and provider is ludicrous in spiritual terms. I may very well end up being both, but if the TRUTH is sought above all else, you can't go in with any conditions or expectations. I wish it were simpler but it just isn't.

Very Clear

By S. Hunter

For me, this is Robert's clearest, most direct book. The 1st monograph, "What You Really Want", is worth the price of admission. In it he describes the initial and rather shocking first meeting he has with people one on one. Without a trace of meanness, the questions he asks do not mince words nor waste time. Even in reading, his questions put you, your understanding, your seeking and expectations and evading, totally on the spot. This is a very good thing. These questions (and Robert's presence that shines throughout) are where the rubber meets the road. All the spiritual maps, templates, and imaginations fall apart in the direct inquiry Robert takes you through. Books regarding the nature of direct experience should be experiential, and this book certainly is.
