How to be a great Leader (and that is different from a manager)

By Jim Estill

Early in the book she talks about self awareness and how that is a critical factor to CEO success. I strongly believe that and have worked very hard on that in my life. She says "...direct ties between self-awareness, self-regulation, motivation, empathy, social skill - and business results."

Henman includes in her book many of the popular studies that have been used in leadership books. I particularly like the grid on competitive advantage where good strategy intersects with good tactics.

Henman's top qualities of a great CEO:

1 - Strategy. I always loved this part of the job and was fairly good at it.

2 - Decisions. She says "when CEO's consistently make good decisions, little else matters". So good decisions are like good habits - they create success. Judging decisions is always easy in hindsight.

3 - Hiring. Of course surround yourself with good people. I was always fortunate to have some of the best around me.

4 - Excellence. High focus on good executions of plans and strategies. For me, this tied in a lot with point 3. I had good people to implement.

5 - Results Orientation.

The final chapter is "Ten Lessons for Leading During Crisis". That chapter alone makes the book worth saving.

Good read - well written.

Finally, a thought leader who has created the blueprint to help evolve tomorrow's leaders!

By Chad Barr, Author of Million Dollar Web Presence

As a leader of my organization, who has found himself "Landing in the Executive Chair," I was faced with great many challenges I needed to overcome. I only wish that I had this book when I first started my business.

The good news is that I now have this book as a great resource on my desk and I know it will help take my organization to higher new levels.

Linda has done a brilliant job in putting together this remarkable treasure, which is loaded with great wisdom and pragmatic how-to techniques.

I love this book and if you are (or plan to be) in any kind of a leadership role, so would you!
